CHAPTER VI.

A VISIT TO FLORA.

Dick went to church with his aunt on Sunday morning. There he saw Mrs. Lancaster again, sitting in the front row of the choir, and was obliged to confess that the bad was obliged to confess that she had gone off very little in those ten years. Her complexion was not quite so blooming, but Dick thought the extra refinement made up for that, and she certainly dressed much better. In fact, she looked very pretty and elegant, and no one would have imagined that she belonged to her rough old sailor father, who sat half-way down the church, bristling with red and gray whiskers, and growling the responses quite out of time and tune with everybody else.

Miss Northcote and Dick were overaken by these two, as they climbed the hill on their way home from church. Flora was passing on with a bow, and a smile for Dick at the end of it, but old Cardew stopped to shake hands with "Well, Mr. Northcote! You've come back more of a man than you went away, if one may judge by appearances."

"I hope so," said Dick.

Yes, he does credit to New Zealand, Cardew, does he not?" said Miss North-

"Good-morning ma'am," said the Captain. "I hope you're well. The best thing you can do for a young fellow is to send him to the other side of the world. Nothing like it for breaking off old ties," "If that's the only use of it-" began Dick, but the Captain did not stay listen to him. Mrs. Lancaster, who had not stopped with her father, had reached the corner just above, where the turned down to their own house, and was looking back

"Good-day to you," he said, flourish-ing his stick as he hurried on after his

"I dont't dislike that odd fellow," said Dick to his aunt. "He used to be very good to me. What a thorough old salt he is! He must find it hard to understand that he is Mrs. Lancaster's father.'

"He admires her very much, I think," anid Miss Northcote. "I am glad! they are so fond of each other—she and her parents. If she did not take care of them they would be very lonely."

"Aunt Kate, that is the first good word I ever heard you say for her."
"Is it, Dick? Well, I may have reasons for not liking her, but I never said or thought that she was without natural affection." "No; that would have been rather too hard on her. She will marryfagain some day; don't you think so ?" Very likely she may." "I still think there are two remarkable things about her," Dick went on as they walked up the lane. "She is so lady like, considering what her parents areand she never seems the least ashamed of "Ladylike, yes," said Miss Northcote. "Taking the word with the meaning that your grandmother used to give it. Not a lady, but an imitation of one."

"Well, of course," said Dick, rather impatiently. "Not an aristocrat, like you. We don't think so much of those things in the colonies." "Ah, I forgot that. Who was your iend Mrs. Herbert?"

"Oh, she an old Norfolk family. No doubt about her. But there's a man at the next station-nobody knows who his wife was yet we are all very friendly together."

"And there is no difference between ner and Mrs. Herbert?" "Of course, a thousand differences," mid Dick. "And I must venture to think, that if you were to renew your acquaintance with Mrs. Lancaster now-see much of her, I mean—you would soon find out a thousand differences between her and any lady you know." 'At any rate, she is prettier than most of them.'

"Very pretty, indeed; there I quite agree with you. She has that immense advantage. And as you say, she is not ashamed of her parents—which one likes, of course.

Dick had not much more to say in fa for of his old friend; it was, indeed, subject on which neither of them could talk very openly, and they were both willing to drop it.

Kate Northcote was vexed with herself, and yet could not help feeling anxious and unhappy. She would have given worlds to turn Dick's thoughts from this woman, who might have her good points, but was, she felt sure, am-bitious, designing, unscrupulous. What could be more natural than that she should try to renew the old flirtation? And Kate could never feel sure about Dick. As a lad he had been very sensitive to any flattery and attention, and she could not think his character was entirely changed, strengthened as he might be. In fact, she thought him very much the same; his old acquaintances, his old amusements, all had their charm for him

That afternoon Mrs. Lancaster was sitting alone in the drawing-room at Rose Cottage. The little room was quite in shade, for the sun-blinds were down, and there was an almost overpowering scent of roses. The stillness and sleepi-ness that belonged to some Sunday afternoons was there in full strength. Flora made no pretense to read, or do anything but doze, as she leaned back in the coolest and shadiest corner. She liked to sit in this room, which was quite her own creating. To her father and mother it was a sort of china-shop, in which they could never be comfortable though all the sereens and trays and tvory ornaments had been brought home by Captain Cardew in his sen going days. They were willing, however, that Flora should be a lady, and have this room to each other in shabby old leather arm-chairs, and where Captain Cardew was allowed to smoke. Mrs. Cardew, who was weak, was sometimes torn between her admiration for her daughter and her love for her husband, and would take work and chat with Flora in the drawing-room. But Flora would presently begin to write a letter, or go off into one of her dreaming fits, and then Mrs. Car-dew got fidgety; and then her husband called her, and she jumped up and hurried away quite readily.

The parlor had one decided advantage over the drawing-room; it commanded the garden gate and the bit of stony lane beyond it.

And that afternoon Mrs. Cardew, who was looking out as usual, was startled by the sudden appearance of a gentleman at the gate. She stared a moment, to be sure that he was coming in, and then burried out to warn her daughter. It would never do for Flora to be caught in a sound nap, such as the Captain was enjoying at this moment.
